Positive Parenting By James Gunaseelan

Positive parenting is very beneficial both for the parent and the child. According to studies, parents who deal with their kids positively form closer bonds with their kids compared to those parents who always criticize their kids. Furthermore, parents who employ positive parenting techniques when dealing with their kids build the self esteem of their children that their children turns out to be more well adjusted compared to children who are constantly subjected to criticisms.

Positive parenting and positive guidance can make a lot of difference in the life of your child especially during the early years. According to experts, children are molded by the experiences that they have when they are very young. If you teach your child to look at life in a more positive way early on, you can help mold your child to grow up into a person with a positive attitude towards life. Furthermore, dealing with your child in a positive way will make your child feel valued as a person. Note that if your child knows that he or she is valued as a person, he or she will grow more confident in him/herself. Teaching your child about social responsibility through positive parenting will help make your child more cooperative with others. According to experts, treating a child with respect will help teach that child the value of respecting others. Furthermore, teaching your child social responsibility through positive parenting will help your child take responsibilities for his or her actions and avoid blaming others for mistakes that he or she committed.

Dealing with a misbehaving child is often very challenging and stressful for parents. However, if you keep a positive attitude about things and deal with your misbehaving child in a positive way, you can turn a negative experience into a valuable learning experience for your child. For instance, if your misbehaving child caused some destruction of property, do not shout at the child and berate him or her for misbehaving. Instead of scolding your child for misbehaving, you should talk to your child calmly and ask him what happened. Let him explain to you why he acted the way he did. According to the principles of positive parenting, you should not blame your child for misbehaving but rather guide the child and help him or her realize why his or her actions were wrong and how he can make things right.
