Teen Parenting And The Effect On Today's Families

By Michelle Bery

Teen pregnancy has always existed. In centuries past, teen pregnancy was universally accepted; people married young and died young; the teen years were the prime of one's life and the time in which childbirth took place.

As times changed and our life expectancies grew, people begin postponing marriage and family. Now it is hardly uncommon for women to wait until well into their thirties to have their first child. As social norms shifted, as did society's perception of teen pregnancy. Before long, teen pregnancy was looked at with scorn. And teen parenting was uncommon and laced with judgment.

But for those teens who decide to face an unwanted pregnancy with a commitment to teen parenting, the struggles encompass more than just society's disapproval. Teen parenting can change the scope of an entire family unit. And while the changes can be positive, as well as negative, they are great changes nonetheless.

First and foremost, teen parenting can alter a teenager's future significantly. No longer is high school graduation and college plans of the utmost priority for a teenaged mother – or even father. A new plan begins to emerge and often it bears no resemblance to what either parent had in mind. This can actually be a period of mourning for those who have put plans on hold or relinquished them altogether.

Often, when there is a teen parenting situation, the teen parent's mother and father must step in to help raise the new baby. Suddenly people who have raised their children and have begun to look towards retirement are thrust back into the challenges of caring for an infant. And because most who tackle teen parenting are unable to financially make it on their own while still attending school, they continue to live at home with the new baby. It can be enormously stressful for everyone involved.

For those who are teen parenting, there is a wide variety of resources available to help ease the transition and make the journey just a little bit easier. Look for local support groups that can give you pointers on balancing the demands of your new life. Turn to family and friends for support and guidance.

And while teen parenting can be demanding, it certainly doesn't have to ruin your life. Many who have been unexpectedly thrust into teen parenting will find that there are rewards as well as challenges.

Understanding The Parenting Magazine

By Michael Webb

If you've ever thought of giving a really helpful baby shower gift, think about giving a subscription to a parenting magazine. This is especially true if the person you're giving the gift to is a first time parent. They can receive helpful advice that is relevant to the age their child is at over the years. Even parents who have done it before would benefit from up to date advice on how to raise children and the issues of raising children in today's society.

A parenting magazine is also a good place to look for educational toys, especially around the holidays. The toys are not just advertised; they are often reviewed and the best age to use a particular toy is part of the review. This will help parents and others buy age appropriate gifts for the child.

A good parenting magazine does book reviews as part of its monthly magazine. They review books for various ages of children so that parents can choose books for their children to read or books they can read to their children. These are generally recently published books that can be purchased on line or through a book club.

"Parenting Magazine" is one of the most popular parenting magazines. While it has unique articles all the time, one of the best features is the sections broken down by age group. That means that if you have a toddler, you can read that section for practical tips and advice from parenting experts. If you have a school-age child, parenting tips and helpful advice is given regarding that age group for interested parents. It is a magazine that can grow as your family grows.

Most parenting magazine pages offer specific sections where parents can write in for specific advice about their child. This can be broken down into different age groups or can be for children of all ages. Some parenting magazines even go up through the difficult teen years so parents of teens can receive some much needed advice.

There is even a parenting magazine called "Gay Parent" for gay families who adopt or have their own children. Some of the issues are the same as with straight families while other problems are unique to gay families. With this magazine, you can find out the most gay friendly vacation spots to take your entire family. There are some resorts and cruises that cater specifically to gay families. Information on these types of vacations can be found in magazines like "Gay Parent".

Another parenting magazine is "Working Mother". This really addresses the needs of single parent or two parent families in which the mother works. Time saving tips are given and you can read articles that are tailored to situations that are unique to having a mother who works. This magazine covers all age groups and is not exclusive to mothers who have babies or young children. Childcare issues, however, are often a topic of discussion as many working parents have children who attend childcare.
